Dragons Pop-Up Book
477527 / $39.95

The Story
The team knew from the start that the book would be wordless, but it still needed a story. To guide Clark as he drew, writer Abby Farson Pratt dreamed up the tale of a little girl who reads a fanciful book about dragons and then starts glimpsing the fantastical creatures from the windows of her school bus. “I thought about myself as a child,” Pratt says. “I loved fairy tales, and I used to think, ‘Wouldn’t it be exciting if I walked into the forest by my house and there were actually fairies there?’”

The Paintings
Stamps and children’s books are two very different art forms. Clark drew the dragons on the stamps using clean lines and almost geometric shapes, but the postal team wanted to create a book that felt “painterly,” with lots of texture, Clark says — like a traditional children’s book. Clark created both the initial sketches and the final paintings digitally. “The technology now is such that you almost can’t tell the difference between digital brushes and gouache or oil,” he says.

The Pop-ups
Many pop-up illustrations are blank on the reverse side. To make the scaly, fire-breathing creatures feel as real as possible to kids, Clark illustrated the back of each dragon’s body. Pop-ups also tend to be fragile, so the books were hand-assembled for durability, with the dragons carefully spaced out and their edges cut in a way that maximizes sturdiness. Production manager Andrew Greeley, who now reads the book over and over with his two-year-old, can say from direct experience that prioritizing the strength of the book’s construction was the right decision. “All the other pop-up books we have end up getting torn,” he says. “This one has stood the test of time.”

Designing with Dragons
How fun and fantastical stamps inspired a pop-up book

TO SAY that Don Clark stays in touch with his inner kid is an understatement. The artist spends his days in a barn-turned-studio, surrounded by his collection of retro children’s books and toys, working on fun-filled projects like the Dragons stamps for the Postal Service. Not long ago, Clark collaborated with the postal team to bring the four dragons from those stamps to life in an immersive pop-up book, drawing on memories from his own childhood. “My favorite children’s books were always the ones you can get lost in,” Clark says. Wordless and whimsical, the book was designed to spark the imaginations of children and parents alike as they explore it together. Here’s how Clark and a team of experts in design, production, and storytelling told the tale of a little girl’s adventure with her dragon friends.
